DEFENDANT-APPELLANT'S REPLY BRIEF

STATEMENT OF ISSUE

DID THE TRIAL COURT ERR IN DENYING SCHABOW'S MOTION FOR RESENTENCING DUE TO VIOLATION OF THE PLEA AGREEMENT BY THE STATE IN SUGGESTING THAT MORE INITIAL CONFINEMENT THAT IT RECOMMENDED WAS WARRANTED?

The trial court answered this question in the negative.

ARGUMENT

THE TRIAL COURT ERRED IN DENYING SCHABOW'S POST CONVICTION MOTION FOR RESENTENCING BECAUSE THE STATE VIOLATED THE PLEA AGREEMENT BY SUBTLELY SUGGESTING THAT THE FACTS JUSTIFIED A LONGER SENTENCE.

1. Standard of review and general principles

The parties agree as to the standard of review and the applicable general principles of law that apply to this case.

2. The State violated the plea agreement by its remarks at sentencing that implied that the amount of incarceration it recommended was less the amount justified by the facts it recited.

The State cited State v. Liukonen, 2004 WI App 157; 276 Wis.2d 64; 686 N.W.2d 689, State v. Sprang, 2004 WI App 121, 274 Wis. 2d 784, 683 N.W.2d 522, State v. Naydihor, 2004 WI 43, 270 Wis. 2d 585, 678 N.W.2d 220, and State v. Hanson, 2000 WI App 10, 232 Wis. 2d 291, 606 N.W.2d 278 as standing for the proposition that a prosecutor may argue that “the court should impose the recommended sentence and nothing less.” (p. 3 of State’s brief). While that paraphrased what ADA Luestcher did in this case, in none of those four cases cited by the State was language to that effect stated by prosecutor. The closest any of those four cases came factually to that statement was a nonfactual suggestion by the Liukonen court that, “The prosecutor could have asserted that the recommendation was appropriate and at the same time argued that the circumstances were so severe that the court should impose no less.” State v. Liukonen ¶ 16. By contrast, ADA Luetscher argued that his recommended period of initial confinement was “the very minimum that should be considered.” (54: 13; Schabow’s App. 119). The distinction is that in case this Luetscher subtlety told Judge Atkinson that a higher amount of initial confinement “could be considered” rather than urging a cap on the court’s sentence as suggested by the Liukonen court (which ended up reversing and remanding the case before it for resentencing).

The State argued that Judge Atkinson’s properly rejected Schabow’s contention that using the phrase that the State recommendation as “the minimum” necessary was a breach of the plea agreement because it used a common phrase from appellate cases. (State’s brief , page 6 ; Also see 75: 11; Schabow’s App. 121). However, Luetscher’s plain language did not comply with the terms of the plea agreement as it at least subtly suggested that there were good reasons to deviate from the nominal terms of the agreement, especially considering the context in which it was uttered (See argument in Schabow’s brief-in-chief, p. 12).

The State also argued that the court’s sentence acknowledged the validity of the State’s recommendation by imposing no more than the period of time recommended by the State on each of the three counts but deviated from the recommendation only by ordering the theft of firearm sentences run consecutive to the burglary count rather than concurrent as recommended by the State (p. 6 of State’s brief). Schabow disagrees. The practical effect of the sentences the court could impose was what Schabow bargained for when he entered into the plea agreement. The imposition of sentences consecutive to the burglary count (even though concurrent to each other) increased the length of Schabow's initial confinement day-for-day as he did not get (nor was he entitled to) sentence credit. See State v. Boettcher, 144 Wis. 2d 86, 89, 423 N.W.2d 533 (1988). Certainly it was the overall quantum of confinement and deprivation of liberty that was the best measure of whether the court believed the State was subtly suggesting the appropriateness of a sentence greater than it recommended rather than the nominal amounts of IC and ES imposed in each sentence.

Although Luetscher did not endorse or even mention the harsher recommendation made by the victim in the case, the argument Luetscher made suggested indifference as to whether the court should impose a greater sentence than that recommended by the State. While this was less blatant than the error of the prosecutor in Sprang (see argument on pages 13-14 of Schabow's brief-in-chief), the practical effect on Schabow was the same: a subtle recommendation of and imposition of more confinement than Schabow reasonably believed would result from his entry into an agreement with the State.

The court's sentencing rationale did not explicitly endorse Melendy's or the State's sentencing argument in imposing sentence in excess of the State's nominal recommendation. However, that does not mean Schabow is not entitled to relief. As the Sprang case further noted in a footnote:

6 Nor does our inquiry turn on whether the sentencing court was influenced by the State's breach. State v. Poole, 131 Wis. 2d 359, 363, 394 N.W.2d 909 (Ct. App. 1986). Therefore, we do not consider the trial court's statement that it did not base its sentencing decision in this case on the State's remarks.

The State's sentencing argument deprived Schabow of the benefit of the plea agreement he agreed to as a condition of entering his no contest pleas. A claim of "harmless error" is insufficient to avoid the requirement for a resentencing to insure him the benefit of the bargain he was entitled to as a matter of due process.

Luetscher's use of a common appellate court phrase in describing the rendering of a criminal sentence and his claim of good faith did not mean it complied with the plea agreement. The test is an objective one: Did the remarks violate the terms of the agreement? It was not enough to have an afterthought about the origins of the offending remark.

Judge Atkinson's decision that the State did not violate the plea agreement by its remarks was incorrect as a matter of law. Denying Schabow's motion for resentencing was error.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated above and in his brief-in-chief, the undersigned attorney requests that this court reverse the Judgment of Conviction and the order denying the post conviction motion in the above matter and remand this case to the trial court for resentencing before a different judge.
