This is a misdemeanor appeal, so the State does not request oral argument or publication.

ARGUMENT

I. THERE WAS REASONABLE SUSPICION IN THIS CASE

A. Reasonable suspicion is a lower standard than probable cause.

Reasonable suspicion is a lower standard than probable cause. Illinois v. Wardlow, 528 U.S. 119, 123 (2000). Reasonable suspicion also requires less than a preponderance of the evidence standard, but still must be more than a mere hunch. U.S. v. Sokolow, 490 U.S. 1, 7 (1989). When considering a reasonable suspicion analysis, the totality of circumstances in each case must be considered to determine if the police officer had a particularized and objective basis to suspect that criminal activity was afoot. U.S. v. Arvizu, 122 S.Ct. 744, 750 (2002).

Reasonable suspicion may rise from behavior that was not illegal and could have had an innocent explanation. State v. Waldner, 206 Wis.2d 51, 58-59 (1996). In Waldner, the Wisconsin Supreme Court upheld the officer's reasonable suspicion to stop a motorist, who was later determined to be operating while intoxicated, based on observations of driving that were not illegal, when standing alone. Waldner stated that "a point is reached where the sum of the whole is greater than the sum of its individual parts." Id. Waldner also explains that a police officer actually observing unlawful conduct is probable cause to arrest, a higher standard than reasonable suspicion requires. Id. The law does not require the police officer to have a precise level of information, and allows police officers to stop persons when they have less than probable cause. Id.

- B. A high crime area and the officer's training and experience may be considered as factors in the reasonable suspicion analysis.

Police officers may “draw on their own experience and specialized training to make inferences from and deductions about the cumulative information available to them that might well elude an untrained person.” U.S. v. Arvizu at 750. Knowledge of a high crime area, based on the officer's training and experience, is a relevant consideration of the entire context of a stop. Illinois v. Wardlow at 124. This case law precedent holds that weight should be given to an officer's training and experience when analyzing reasonable suspicion.

A high crime area alone cannot be used as the basis for reasonable suspicion, but it can be considered as one factor in an analysis based on the totality of circumstances. State v. Morgan, 197 Wis.2d 200, 211 (1995), and Illinois v. Wardlow at 124. In Morgan, the police officer testified that the stop was in a “fairly high-crime-rate area,” there was not a lot of traffic in the area at 4 AM, the vehicle drove in and out of an alley, and the vehicle made several turns within a few city blocks. The police officer stopped the vehicle for expired license plates and observed that the driver appeared nervous while searching for his driver's license. Morgan at 204. The Wisconsin Supreme Court upheld these facts as reasonable suspicion.

In Ms. Ponfil's case, Officer Brann provided extensive testimony about this area. Officer Brann testified about Nick's Bar's reputation as a cocaine bar, that is based on information provided by individuals he has talked to who have familiarity with the establishment. Motion Hearing, November 19, 2015, Transcript 52:9-23. Officer Brann further testified about specific instances of conduct at Nick's Bar that he personally experienced. He testified about observing individuals coming and going from Nick's Bar with open intoxicants and publicly urinating outside the bar. Tr. 7:20-8:1, and 30:24-31:8. He testified about a specific incident that he himself experienced, that involved a fighting disturbance and a firearm. He had personal knowledge of a prior violent incident taking place in that area. Tr. 50:21-51:18. Officer Brann not only knew Nick's Bar's reputation as being in a high crime area and a cocaine bar, but also observed particularized instances that corroborated the bar's reputation.

Judge Hinkfuss ruled that "the State did indeed prove that the area was high crime." Decision and Order, dated January 20, 2016, p. 2, para. 1. Considerable weight was properly given to Officer Brann's training and personal experience with Nick's Bar as a high crime area.

At the motion hearing, the defense presented Defense Exhibit #1 "Calls for Service Report by Address." Tr. 32:15. This document should be given very little weight in this analysis for two reasons. First, the comparison between Nick's Bar and the nearby McDonald's restaurant is a completely faulty comparison. These are two totally different kinds of establishments based on the testimony that was presented. McDonald's is open 24 hours. Tr. 50:5. Nick's Bar has traffic primarily between 11 PM and 3 AM. Tr. 33:23. McDonald's is a fast food restaurant that appeals to everyone, while Nick's Bar is a tavern that appeals to adults only. Officer Brann testified that McDonald's and its customers are more likely to call police if there is a incident, whereas taverns try to avoid calling police because it can negatively impact their business. Tr. 50:5-20. Comparing a McDonald's restaurant to Nick's Bar is like comparing apples to zebras.

The second reason that Defense Exhibit #1 should be given little weight is because of the exhibit's characterization of the incident in this case. The entry in the document for this incident, dated "7/12/15" in the document, describes it as a "Suspicious vehicle." Exh. #1, page 9 of 13. There is no mention of this being an incident involving cocaine, even though cocaine was discovered during this case. The "Incident Types" are such general descriptions that they offer very limited value.

- C. There was elevated tension because of the occupant's movements and there was a known gang member in the vehicle.

Officer Brann testified that Nick's Bar is in a high crime area that includes gang activity, and that gang activity is commonly associated with criminal activity. Tr. 16:1-2. Officer Brann further testified that as he approached the vehicles, he recognized one of the occupants as a known gang member, which heightened his awareness. Tr. 15:19-16:2. He knew the gang members name and gang affiliation. Tr. 30:14. He was in full uniform, did not have his firearm drawn and was using his flashlight. Tr. 14:24-25.

As he approached the vehicles, he observed movement among the occupants of both vehicles. Officer Brann testified that the movement did not fit the circumstance of him approaching the vehicles on foot with his emergency lights off. Officer Brann testified that he has dozens of contacts per night, and the occupants' response to him was disproportionate to the situation. The occupants "aggressive actions" toward him, gave him a "heightened awareness." Tr. 14:1-24.

Officer Brann stated that his only motion at that point was walking up to the vehicles, and the occupants starting opening doors and moving around a lot, including the Defendant, who was driving one of the vehicles. Officer Brann testified that it was not until after he made these observations, while he was approaching the vehicles on foot, that he would not have let anyone leave. Tr. 16:8-19. These additional observations are significantly different than what the officer observed in Young. The cocaine at issue in this case was observed by Officer Brann on the ground outside the vehicle, shortly after the point of seizure.

As in Morgan, none of these activities individually are incriminating. But when considered in the entire context of the incident, they give rise to reasonable suspicion.

These additional observations are significantly different than what the officer observed in Young. State v. Young, 294 Wis,2d 1 (Ct.App. 1997). In Young, the police officer makes a pedestrian stop based on information from other officers, in a high-crime area, and Young himself is fairly cooperative with the contact. The officer had no particularized observations of the area as a high-crime area, as Officer Brann does in Ms. Ponfil's case. Furthermore, there was no behavior in Young that would have heightened the awareness of the situation and raised tension.

CONCLUSION

Officer Brann's testimony established a particularized and objective basis for the investigatory stop of the defendant that was beyond a mere hunch. There was reasonable suspicion based on 1) Officer Brann's knowledge of the area's high crime reputation, corroborated by his own personal observations and experiences in that area, 2) the "aggressive actions" of the occupants, one of whom was a confirmed gang member, that gave him a "heightened awareness," 3) the occupants were opening doors and moving around a lot, and significantly outnumbered the officer, and 4) the occupants disproportionate response to his approach on foot with his squad lights off. Each individual fact in this case in isolation may have an innocent explanation, but when considered in their totality, the factual observations of Officer Brann rise to reasonable suspicion.

Therefore, the State respectfully requests that the Court find that Officer Brann did have reasonable suspicion to seize the Defendant to investigate criminal activity, and uphold Judge Hinkfuss' denial of the Defendant's motion to suppress evidence.
